GINT 760 Fall, 2001 Office Hours, Monday and Wednesday 1:30 – 3:30 p.m. or by appointment

This graduate seminar provides an introduction to and overview of some of the most important research in various subfields of American politics. It is designed to be the first graduate course on American politics that students take. It is intended to be broad in scope and to provide a theoretical, methodological, and substantive foundation for further study of American politics. To achieve this goal, a sampling of both some of the "classics" in the professional literature and samples of some of the current "hot" approaches to the study of politics are included. Students planning to be examined in American politics are expected to master recommended readings on their own and should review additional readings included in versions of this seminar offered in previous years. This course is not a course on contemporary American politics; this is a seminar on basic, political science research in American politics.

REQUIREMENTS:

The main requirements for this course are simple – READ, THINK ANALYTICALLY, and DISCUSS! This is a graduate seminar, which means that our meetings will be governed by the insights you draw from your readings and writings. It is not a lecture course! You are expected to read and critically analyze all assigned readings prior to class. Your preparation for each class should be based on the assumption that you will be responsible for leading and stimulating the class discussion. This is successfully accomplished by sharing your critical insights with the group, offering significant questions for seminar discussion, and engaging your colleagues (and me) in scholarly debate. I understand that you begin this course as a "student" who completes assignments. I hope that you end it as an engaged participant who takes on the study of American politics as an exciting personal enterprise.

Your full participation in the seminar (even if you are auditing) is fundamental to its success.

Prerequisites:

This course has no formal prerequisites. Yet, as a graduate course, it assumes that you are familiar with the basic character of American politics. If your background does not include formal training in Political Science, or if you feel as though you might benefit from a review, you might want to purchase an undergraduate textbook and read the material carefully. I recommend Samuel Kernell and Gary C. Jacobson. 2000. The Logic of American Politics. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Quarterly Press. This text offers students the "nuts and bolts" of the American political system with a strong theoretical (rational choice) perspective. Please let me know if you expect difficulties here.

EVALUATION:

Your final grade will be based upon a final examination, a series of 3-5 page papers, and the quality of your verbal participation in class. The take home final examination (25%) will consist of four questions on American politics which are similar in nature to those found in recent comprehensive field examinations. You will be required to answer two of the four questions, and will be given two days to complete the exam. Each student also will prepare five critical papers (50%) during the course of the semester. These papers should be no more than five pages long (they can be, and most often will be, shorter!), and should be e-mailed to seminar participants (this, obviously, includes me) no later than noon the day before class. The papers should critique the theoretical and/or methodological approaches taken in the assigned readings for the week, give suggestions for alternative perspectives or explanations, or identify links to alternative literature. In completing your critical paper, you must select at least one work from the "Supplementary Readings" for the week for inclusion in your essay. Finally, your seminar participation accounts for the remaining 25% of your grade.
